

This series looks at the work of EPES in Chile

No 10: June 2014

RISING UP FROM THE ASHES

What began April 12 as a forest fire at the edge of the city quickly raced down the slopes of low-income sectors of Valparaiso, reducing 3,000 houses to ashes and leaving 12,000 people homeless. Today, in the aftermath of that devastating blaze, community organizations are intent on turning tragedy into an opportunity for transforming their neighborhood.

One of few buildings left standing on Cerro Las Cañas, the area most affected by the blaze, is the community center, whose director Mauricio Salazar graduated from EPES 3rd International Training Course on Popular Education in Health two years ago. The center has become the hub of emergency response activity, serving lunches to 300 people daily, distributing aid, coordinating volunteers and providing a site for neighborhood meetings.

The Las Cañas Community Center will be key to setting in motion the Comfort for Kids post-disaster psychosocial support program for children and women that EPES adapted in Concepción after the earthquake four years ago. EPES also will help neighbors winterize and improve the flimsy emergency dwellings the government is issuing, while also empowering women as leaders.

First, however, the community center's windows must be installed, the bathrooms and kitchen repaired, and basic furnishings acquired to enable the building to be used to carry out the programs.

The disaster exposed substandard living conditions and rampant poverty, while tragically confirming experts' warnings less than a year ago that the area was susceptible to a major fire. Residents don't want to rebuild their former precarious housing. With support from EPES, neighbors hope to seize the opportunity to build a more dignified community that projects their lives into a new and brighter future.

EPES staff and health promoters prepare emergency aid kits, for distribution at the Las Cañas Community Center to residents of Valparaiso devastated by the fire in April.

The women from Kenya and Uganda were enthusiastic about these educational techniques. They shop in similar markets but had not imagined their potential for health education.

CROSSING CONTINENTS: KENYAN WOMEN LAUNCH EPES MODEL IN AFRICA

Six women from Kenya who traveled to Chile to participate in EPES 5th International Training Course on Popular Education in Health (January 10-25, 2014) have taken decisive steps to begin applying the EPES model of empowerment to bring positive change to their communities. Since 2010, thanks to ELCA World Hunger Funds, 90 participants from 14 countries have participated in the annual training course, gaining skills to run participatory preventive health programs.

EPES partnered with the Hope Foundation for African Women (HFAW), a Nairobi-based non-profit headed by Dr. Grace Mose-Okong’o that works with Maasai and Kisii women, to coordinate its 5th international school. In Santiago and in southern Concepción, the African women attended workshops on participatory community assessments, learn-by-playing techniques, strategic planning and creative evaluation methods, developed by EPES in its three decades of work.

The HFAW action plan calls for a 6-month pilot project to train community health promoters to address urgent social and health issues such as violence against women, HIV/AIDS and female genital mutilation (FGM).

In the first two months after returning to Kenya, HFAW set about adapting EPES material and planning the training sessions. The response to the first training session, held April 2-4 in a Kisii village, was overwhelming. Some 300 people arrived for the launch, where, in a festive ambience HFAW staff gave testimony to their powerful experience in Chile, and the capacity for change of the EPES popular education model. A second training session was held April 21-23.

In launching the project, HFAW faces difficult logistical challenges, such as the exhausting and expensive five hours of travel to Kisii. Dr. Mose gave voice to the organization’s determination: “We have encountered many challenges which could have discouraged any major organization from moving forward, but [...] every one of these challenges has provided many learning opportunities. Rather than get discouraged, our resolve has been strengthened and our vision is much clearer.”

Training sessions on the EPES popular education model in a Kenyan Kisii village had an overwhelming response. The HFAW action plan calls for a 6-month pilot project.

ANTI-SMOKING EFFORTS EARN INTERNATIONAL ACCOLADES

Chile Libre de Tabaco (Tobacco-Free Chile) received an award in San Jose, Costa Rica, for contributing to the passage of the law to help reduce tobacco addiction and smoke-related disease in Chile.

At the 4th Latin American and Caribbean Congress on Tobacco or Health, held in San José, Costa Rica, March 26-28, Chile Libre de Tobacco (Tobacco-Free Chile), a coalition spearheaded by EPES, was applauded alongside the Chilean Health Ministry for contributing to the passage of landmark legislation that transformed Chile into a smoke-free country as of March 1 of last year.

Sonia Covarrubias, Chile Libre de Tabaco coordinator, and Isabel Diaz Medina, communications director, traveled to Costa Rica to accept the award from the Inter American Heart Foundation and participate in this important international forum, which brought together more than 400 people from 20 countries.

"The award renews our commitment to keep working to obtain public policy that will prevent more Chileans from becoming ill and dying as a result of tobacco", affirmed Covarrubias.

Prohibiting additives such as menthol and enacting a tobacco tax are measures that should follow passage of anti-smoking legislation like the Chilean law. In Chile, where debate on tax reform is underway in Congress, Covarrubias indicated that the immediate focus would be enactment of a tobacco tax.

The World Health Organization regards taxes as the most cost-effective way to improve public health, and President Michelle Bachelet, who took office in March, included a tobacco tax as part of her platform.

CITIZENS KEEP TRACK OF TOBACCO LAW COMPLIANCE

In Talcahuano, a municipality in the Bio Bio Region, EPES coordinated the first citizen monitoring of the 2013 tobacco law. After inspecting 27 public places including restaurants, pubs and clubs, the group reported 75% compliance with anti-smoking measures that call for display of no-smoking signs and removal of ashtrays, among others. Prior to the activity, 100 people attended a seminar, with speakers from the regional health ministry, Chile Libre de Tabaco/EPES, and a bronchopulmonary specialist. To raise awareness among teenagers, artist Cristian Carrasco helped students paint a mural on school walls, depicting the risks from smoking and promoting a healthy lifestyle. In a district of southern Santiago, citizens also monitored tobacco law compliance, presenting their findings to the mayor in a May 27th meeting.

EPES was created in 1982 to promote health with dignity for the poor through empowerment, mobilization and collective action. It began as a program of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile (IELCH) and maintains close ties nationally and internationally with the Lutheran church and is an ELCA Global Mission supported ministry. EPES became an independent, non-profit Chilean foundation in 2002.

AGING GRACEFULLY

Thirteen community health promoters of the Zenobia Cerda Zapata Health Group in Hualpen participated in the first unit of a seminar on senior citizen health, held by EPES May 19. The session addressed issues associated with biological, social, psychological and sexual changes common to women and men as they age. The health promoters had the chance to converse frankly about their own experiences and for learning ways to assist neighbors and other peers grappling with similar problems.
